99000000000 🔷 0000000000000 SHORT STORY OF THE DAY $0000000000 • 00000000000 SECRET IN BUNCH OF LETTERS.

Mrs. Ardleigh stood looking inquiringly at her husband or she twirled the little packet of letters in her hand. suppose I am at liberty to read them, she sald, with a little spice of af lectation, "since they are my own love letrestation, since they are my own love lef-ters to you?"

"Certainly," he returned indifferently and went on with the writing.
Mrs Ardieigh's red roses deepened a lit-tle. Nevertheless, she proceeded to open the packet and indobently look over one letter after another.

Buddenly her indelence vanished and size tarned a burning less upon the letter in her hand and decoured it with a crushy herce anger.

flerce anger. "Why was be such a fool as to put this Why was be such a fool as to pet this letter among mine? she thought. "Who is, or was, this filena Southard A —? What right had she to thus address, six weeks ago, the man who has been my hissland for three months? I know he married him for the Same reason.

Chance favored Mrs. Ardleigh in loss than a fortnight. While one day waiting for a few minutes within a photograph gallery, she care leady examined the pictures. Struck by the remarkable beauty of one of them, she turned inquiringly to the indy in attendance.

"It is a Miss Southard," was the start-Southard" exclaimed Mrs. Ardleigh. The lady referred to her books, saying as the fady referred to her hooks, saying as she did sor.

I hope this may be the one, madam, for Miss Southard is sadir in need of friends. Southard Miss Rem. Southard. Yes, madam, here is the vary name.

"And the nonress."

"Nineteen — street."

"And the nonress"

"Nincteen street."

Thank yes: I will see the hely and give her campleyment," Airs, Ardleigh redied with a bow.

A short drive took her to street, and the was soon in the presence of the heautiful, fair-naired original of the picture.

Mrs. Ardleigh endeavored to be charming, she was, therefore, quite phensant, and when she delicately projected that Miss Southard should accompany her home, in order to propose that Miss Southard should accompany her home, in order to propose the source of the mane of her amable patroness.

"We will, if you please, Miss Southard, walt for my husband," smiled Mrs. Ardleigh, courseously. "He will no doubt be here in a very few minutes."

All was now in readiness, and with bentleigh, coursensy. He will no doubt be here in a very few minutes."

All was now in readiness, and with benting heart she awalted the decisive moment. It was at hand. The door opened and Mr. Ardleigh appeared.

"Permit me—" commenced the lady, but before she could after another word Miss Southard had caught sight of Mr. Ardleigh. For an instant she stood motionless, the great joy of her heart irradiating her face with almost heavenly beauty. The next, with a low, thrilling cry of "My husband!" she sprang forward as if to filing herself upon his bosom, blind to sit but the sweet truth that he was there before her.

But Mrs. Ardleigh's large, muscular arm interposed an unexpected barrier, and Mrs. Ardleigh's voice rang out the proud, contemptuous query:

"Are your a livestic Miss Sankonds" of Ardiegh's cole rang out the proud, con-temptions query;

"Are you a limatic, Miss Southard?" ad-ding Instantly, with freezing hanteur;
"Permit me to introduce my husband, Mr. Ardleigh, Charles, this is Miss Southard, a young lady in whom I have a good rea-son to feel an interest." Your husband! echoed Miss Southandying tones. "Did you say your her nd, madam" replied Mrs. Ardleigh

Since when?"
Since the 1st of October last, three months ago."

Miss Southard toosed her hold, and dropped her head in utter weariness upon her bosom for an instant. Then, raising her eyes, she murmured, sadiv;

"Madam, I am truly sorry for you. You are no wife. I was married to Charles Ardieigh on the 9th day of last May."
